Registration: Your Protection

The right to use a professional title is controlled by provincial law and requires membership in a regulatory organization. This status indicates that a health professional has the basic educational preparation required to practice competently and that he or she subscribes to established standards of practice and ethics. You can find out if the person caring for you is in good standing of his or her profession by calling the organization for that profession listed here.

The Health Care Professionals of British Columbia

When you put yourself in the hands of a health care professional, you are entitled to competent and ethical treatment. Usually, that is exactly what you get. There may be times, however, when you think that professional standards are not being met. Here are some things you can do if that happens.

Looking out for you

In British Columbia, virtually all health care professionals are accountable to a regulatory college, board or association. These organizations are responsible, under provincial legislation, for “serving and protecting the public.” They do this by communicating new developments in professional practice and ensuring that their regulated professionals are qualified and follow clearly defined standards of ethics and practice. The organizations also act when it appears that one of their regulated professionals is practising in a manner that is incompetent, unethical or impaired by alcohol, drugs or a mental condition.

This public service and protection is provided by the professions themselves. The public is directly involved through government-appointed representatives on the organizations’ boards of directors. The organizations also make regular reports to the provincial government.

If you have a problem

If you are concerned about the conduct of a health care professional, the first thing you should consider is talking the problem over with him or her; difficulties often result from misunderstandings or poor communications. If you are still not satisfied, and the professional works for an agency such as a hospital, you may wish to speak to the person in charge at the agency. If there is no agency involved, or if it cannot help with your problem, you can contact the appropriate regulatory body listed in this pamphlet. This organization can give you information on the standards you can expect in the delivery of care and what can be done if they are not met.

What the regulatory organization can do

The regulatory organization can take action after it receives a complaint about one of its members. This involves a thorough investigation and, if warranted, a formal inquiry. If the professional is found to have behaved improperly, the organization may issue a reprimand, require a supervised program of help, or suspend or terminate his or her authority to practice. Some organizations may also levy a fine. They do not have the authority to order compensation for any harm that may have been done or to direct how an agency supervises or disciplines a professional employed by it.

Making a complaint

If you think you want to make a formal complaint, talk to the people at one of the regulatory organizations listed in this brochure. They can advise you what to do. You may be asked to put your complaint in writing and give the name of the professional, where he or she works, details of the specific actions being complained about, and provide any available supporting documents. You should also identify yourself so that the matter can be thoroughly investigated. If you are not satisfied with the actions taken by the regulatory organization, you may be able to appeal them through various channels including the Supreme Court of British Columbia and the Ombudsman.

These are the organizations to which British Columbia health care professionals are accountable. They can give you information about the standards you can expect in the delivery of care and what you can do if you believe these standards are not being met.
